OPINIONS BELOW

The published opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit was filed on October 7, 1988, and is cited at 858 F.2d 1201. This opinion appears as Appendix A.[1]

[1] As of this date, the petitioner does not have access to the reported opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. The petitioner has therefore reproduced the opinion in its original form as Appendix A.

The published memorandum opinion and order of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Tennessee were filed on June 12, 1987, and are cited at 664 F.Supp. 1113. This memorandum opinion and order appear as Appendix B.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit was entered on October 7, 1988. This petition was filed within 60 days of that date.

This Court's jurisdiction is invoked under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION INVOLVED

U.S. Const. Amend. XIV, § 1:

> No state . . . shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The respondent was indicted by the Grand Jury for Davidson County, Tennessee, on charges of first-degree murder and two (2) counts of aggravated kidnapping in connection with the 1980 murder of Monty Hudson and the kidnapping of Monty Hudson and Elizabeth Hudson. Prior to trial, the prosecutor tendered to the respondent an offer of two (2) years imprisonment in exchange for his plea of guilty to simple kidnapping. Acting upon the advice of one of his retained counsel, and against the advice of his other retained counsel, the respondent rejected the prosecutor's plea offer and elected to be put to trial.

Thereupon, on February 9, 1983, the respondent was convicted in a jury trial of the crime of first-degree murder, receiving a sentence of life imprisonment. The respondent was also convicted of two (2) counts of aggravated kidnapping, and was sentenced to serve forty (40) years incarceration on each count. The state trial court ordered these sentences to be served concurrently.

Following his conviction, the respondent filed a motion for a new trial in the state trial court alleging that his Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel was violated by the services rendered by counsel during the plea bargaining process. On October 26, 1983, the state trial court granted the respondent a new trial, finding that the respondent had been denied effective assistance of counsel where one of his retained counsel did not affirmatively advise the respondent to accept the prosecutor's offer of two (2) years' imprisonment in exchange for a plea of guilty to simple kidnapping.

On August 7, 1984, the Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment of the state trial court granting the respondent a new trial, and the case was remanded for a new trial. State v. James Howard Turner, Davidson Criminal, C.C.A. No. 83-278-III (Opinion released August 7, 1984, at Nashville). The Tennessee Supreme Court thereafter denied the state's application for permission to appeal on December 14, 1984.

On remand to the state trial court, the respondent and the prosecutor engaged in plea negotiations wherein the prosecutor offered the respondent a sentence of twenty (20) years in exchange for his plea of guilty to the crime of aggravated kidnapping. The respondent countered with an offer to plead guilty to the crime of simple kidnapping, with a maximum sentence of ten (10) years. When it appeared that no agreement could be reached between the prosecutor and the respondent, plea negotiations terminated.

Subsequent to the termination of the plea negotiations, the respondent filed a "Motion to Reinstate Plea Offer, or in the Alternative, to Dismiss the Indictment" in the state trial court. Finding that a new trial would not effectively remedy the constitutional violation occasioned by counsel's inadequate representation, the state trial court granted the respondent's motion. In granting the respondent's motion, the state trial court specifically held that the prosecutor's offer of twenty (20) years was not tainted by vindictiveness.

Much aggrieved by the state trial court's grant of relief, the state filed an application for extraordinary appeal by permission in the Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals. The Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals granted the state's application and reversed the judgment of the state trial court on January 16, 1986. In reversing the judgment of the state trial court, the Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals remanded the case for a new trial. State v. Turner, 713 S.W.2d 327 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1986).

The Tennessee Supreme Court subsequently denied the respondent's application for permission to appeal on June 2, 1986.

The respondent thereafter filed a petition for the writ of certiorari in this Court. The Court denied the respondent's petition on November 3, 1986. Turner v. Tennessee, 479 U.S. 933 (1986).

On February 25, 1987, the respondent filed a petition for the writ of habeas corpus in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Tennessee. Finding that a presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness applies to any plea offer greater than the original offer of two (2) years, the district court granted the respondent habeas corpus relief:

> For the reasons stated in the accompanying Memorandum, the writ of habeas corpus shall issue within 30 days unless the trial court holds a plea hearing at which (1) petitioner has an opportunity, if he chooses, to present the former two-year offer as a presumptively completed plea agreement for consideration by the court; and (2) the prosecutor has the opportunity, if he chooses, to seek recision of the putative agreement conditioned upon an objective showing sufficient to rebut the presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness under the Blackledge v. Perry [, 417 U.S. 21 1972)] line of precedents. Of course, the trial judge is otherwise free to accept or reject any plea agreement offered, including the two-year plea, in accordance with the criteria otherwise applicable under substantive and procedural law.

Turner, 664 F.Supp. at 1126. (Appendix B, at A52). The judgment of the district court was affirmed by the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit on October 7, 1988. Turner, 858 F.2d at —. (Appendix A, at A16).

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

The Court of Appeals erroneously determined that a presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness is applicable where the prosecutor has tendered to the respondent a plea offer embodying a substantial reduction in the charges pending against the respondent and the permissible punishment for such charges.

In an opinion without precedent, the Court of Appeals determined that a rebuttable presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness applies to any plea offer made by the prosecutor in excess of his prior offer of two (2) years. To remedy the alleged due process violation, the Court of Appeals fashioned what the district court termed a "presumptively completed plea agreement," thereby effectively granting the respondent specific performance of the rejected plea offer conditioned upon the prosecutor establishing by objective evidence a non-retaliatory motive.

The petitioner recognizes the principle that where a convicted defendant has successfully availed himself of his statutory or constitutional rights to obtain direct or collateral relief from his conviction, the prosecution may not institute additional or more severe charges against the defendant which pertain to the same criminal episode in order to punish the defendant for exercising his rights or to discourage other defendants from exercising their rights. See, e.g., United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368 (1982); Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974); North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969).

While a presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness may apply where the prosecution institutes additional or more severe charges against a defendant under the aforementioned circumstances, it is clear that such a presumption has no applicability to circumstances where the prosecution has not instituted additional or more severe charges against the defendant. See, e.g., Vardes v. Estelle, 715 F.2d 206, 213 (5th Cir. 1983); Miracle v. Estelle, 592 F.2d 1269, 1275 (5th Cir. 1979); United States v. Brooklier, 685 F.2d 1208, 1215 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied 459 U.S. 1206 (1983); United States v. Gallegos-Curiel, 681 F.2d 1164, 1168 (9th Cir. 1982); United States v. Rosales-Lopez, 617 F.2d 1349, 1357 (9th Cir. 1980).

In the case at bar, the prosecutor did not institute additional or more severe charges against the respondent. Rather, by tendering a twenty (20) year plea offer, the prosecutor actually reduced the charges pending against the respondent from first-degree murder and two (2) counts of aggravated kidnapping to one (1) count of aggravated kidnapping. In offering the respondent this particular bargain, the prosecutor also dramatically reduced the permissible range of punishment for these charges from three (3) consecutive terms of life imprisonment to a mere twenty (20) years' incarceration.

The circumstances of the instant case are remarkably similar to the circumstances present in United States v. Osif, 789 F.2d 1404 (9th Cir. 1986). Osif was charged with first-degree murder; prior to trial, the prosecutor offered Osif a ten (10) year sentence in exchange for his plea of guilty to second-degree murder. Osif rejected this offer and was subsequently convicted of first-degree murder.[2] Id., at 1404. On appeal from this conviction, Osif was granted a new trial. 753 F.2d 1085 (1985).

[2] The Court of Appeals' opinion is silent as to the length of the sentence Osif received upon his conviction for first-degree murder. However, the opinion does reflect that this sentence was greater than the fifteen (15) year sentence imposed upon Osif's conviction for second-degree murder. Id., at 1405 n. 2.

On remand, the prosecutor offered Osif a fifteen (15) year sentence in exchange for his plea of guilty to second-degree murder. Osif accepted this offer and entered a plea of guilty in accordance with the terms of the plea bargain.

On appeal from his plea of guilty, Osif claimed that the district court erred in refusing to compel the government to reinstate the previously rejected plea offer and in declining to find vindictiveness in the government's refusal to resubmit the original offer. Id., at 1404-1405. Rejecting Osif's reliance upon Blackledge, Pearce and "their progeny," the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that the government was under no obligation to reinstate the original plea offer. Id., at 1405.

The court further opined that Osif's claim of prosecutorial vindictiveness was without substance:

> . . . [T]he vindictive prosecution doctrine does not apply when neither the charge's severity nor the sentence is increased. [Citation omitted]. Here, neither the sentence nor the charge was increased. Rather, the government merely refused to reoffer, after an intervening conviction for first-degree murder, as lenient a bargain as was previously rejected by Osif prior to trial.
> Further, vindictiveness is not present if there are independent reasons or intervening circumstances to justify the prosecutor's action. [Citations omitted]. Osif's intervening first-degree murder conviction, . . . , is an intervening circumstance that properly could cause the prosecutor to view a new plea offer in a different light. Under any standard of review, we cannot find government vindictiveness.

Id.

While the petitioner contends that the rationale of the Osif decision is persuasive and should control the result of the instant case, there are other reasons which compel the conclusion that there is no reasonable likelihood of vindictiveness on the part of the prosecutor in tendering a plea offer involving more than two (2) years' incarceration. Most significantly, the concept of prosecutorial vindictiveness is foreign to the plea bargaining process, where both parties possess relatively equal bargaining power and where the respondent is free to accept or reject the prosecutor's offer without exposing himself to greater or additional charges under the facts of this case. See Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 363, 365 (1978).

Moreover, the prosecutor's desire to forego a jury trial by engaging in plea negotiations (despite knowledge that he has sufficient proof to convict the respondent of first-degree murder and two (2) counts of aggravated kidnapping, thereby exposing the respondent to possible punishment of three (3) consecutive life sentences) is constitutionally legitimate where there is no dispute but that the respondent is properly charged with first-degree murder and two (2) counts of aggravated kidnapping. Id.

Finally, the remedy devised by the Court of Appeals creates an anomalous situation: Although the court found that any offer greater than two (2) years evinces prosecutorial vindictiveness, the respondent himself is willing to accept a sentence of ten (10) years.

For these reasons, the petitioner submits that the Court of Appeals erred in according a mere plea offer constitutional significance by applying a presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness to any subsequent plea offer greater than the original, unconsummated offer of two (2) years.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, the petitioner urges this Court to grant the writ of certiorari.

Decided and Filed October 7, 1988

Before: KEITH, MARTIN, and RYAN, Circuit Judges.

MARTIN, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court, in which KEITH, Circuit Judge, joined. RYAN, Circuit Judge, (pp. 15-17) delivered a separate opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part.

BOYCE F. MARTIN, JR., Circuit Judge. The State of Tennessee appeals the district court's conditional grant of a writ of habeas corpus. James Howard Turner, who was awaiting retrial in a Tennessee criminal court, petitioned the district court for habeas corpus relief on the grounds that his impending retrial would violate his Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel and his Fourteenth Amendment right to due process of law free of vindictive prosecution. The district court conditionally granted the writ, and we now affirm.

I.

Turner and two co-defendants, Earl Carroll and Sam John Passarella, were indicted for the kidnapping of Monte [sic, Monty] Hudson and his wife and for the murder of Mr. Hudson. The record indicates that the co-defendants accosted the Hudsons in the parking lot of a Nashville Hotel. Mrs. Hudson, who was driven away by Turner, was released unharmed the following day. Mr. Hudson, however, was taken by Carroll and Passarella and murdered.

The co-defendants were tried separately. Carroll agreed to a two-year sentence for simple kidnapping. After a jury trial at which both Carroll and Mrs. Hudson testified, Passarella was convicted of two counts of aggravated assault and sentenced to 70 years in prison.

Turner was represented by Lance Bailey, an attorney from Socorro, New Mexico. Assistant district attorney general John Zimmerman [sic, Zimmermann], who also tried the case and is responsible for plea negotiations now, represented the State. Concerned about the trauma that Mrs. Hudson would suffer by testifying at another trial, the State offered Turner the same plea arrangement that Carroll had accepted. This offer remained open until the deadline for settlements imposed by the court. Despite strong recommendations from other attorneys to accept the plea offer, Bailey advised Turner against this offer. The deadline for settlement expired.

On February 9, 1983, Turner was tried before a jury on one count of felony murder and two counts of aggravated kidnapping. Carroll and Mrs. Hudson again testified. Turner was convicted on all three counts and sentenced to life imprisonment for murder plus 40 years on each kidnapping count.

Turner moved for a new trial on the grounds that he had received ineffective assistance of counsel in deciding to reject the two-year plea offer. After an evidentiary hearing, the state trial court granted the motion. State v. Turner, No. C-8536 (Fifth Cir. Ct. for Davidson County Nov. 3, 1983). The Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed, State v. Turner, No. 83-287-III (Tenn. Crim. App. Aug. 7, 1984), and the Tennessee Supreme Court denied permission to appeal and concurred in the result. State v. Turner, No. 83-287-III (Tenn. Dec. 17, 1984).

Pursuant to the order of the state trial court, Turner was detained from the time of his trial in February of 1983 until the Tennessee Supreme Court's decision in December of 1984. Upon remand to the trial court for a new trial, Turner was released on bond and plea negotiations resumed. During these negotiations, the State refused to offer Turner a plea of less than 20 years. Eventually, Turner petitioned the trial court to order the State to reinstate its original two-year offer or, in the alternative, to dismiss the indictment. The state trial court granted Turner's motion on the grounds that the "only way in which the constitutional violation can be neutralized in this case, is to require the State to reinstate the two year plea bargain offer, or to order the case dismissed." State v. Turner, No. C-8536, slip op. at 4 (Fifth Cir. Ct. for Davidson County Feb. 28, 1985).

Pursuant to Tenn. R. App. P. 10, the State applied for an extraordinary appeal. In reversing, the Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals held that the court could not require the State to make a particular plea bargain offer and that the proper remedy was to remand for a new trial. State v. Turner, 713 S.W.2d 327 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1986). The Tennessee Supreme Court denied permission to appeal, State v. Turner, 713 S.W.2d 327 (Tenn. 1986), and the U.S. Supreme Court denied certiorari. Turner v. Tennessee, 107 S.Ct. 407 (1986). Trial was set for June 15, 1987. On February 25, 1987, Turner petitioned the federal district court for a writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 2241(c)(3) and 2254(a).

The district court found that it had jurisdiction to entertain Turner's petition and that Turner had exhausted his state remedies on the issues of the appropriate remedy for deprivation of his right to counsel and the application of the presumption of vindictive prosecution to the subsequent plea bargaining. After deciding that ineffective advice to reject a plea offer can infringe the right to effective assistance of counsel guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment, the district court determined de novo that Bailey's conduct was both incompetent and prejudicial under Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984). Finally, the district court determined that the appropriate remedy for the deprivation of Turner's Sixth Amendment right would be a new plea hearing during which a rebuttable presumption of vindictiveness would attach to any plea offer made by the State in excess of its original two-year offer. Therefore, the district court ordered that a writ of habeas corpus be issued unless the state trial court held such a hearing. Turner v. State of Tennessee, 664 F. Supp. 1113 (M.D. Tenn. 1987).

On appeal, the State makes four arguments. First, the State claims that the district court did not have jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c) to entertain Turner's petition for habeas corpus relief. Second, the State contends that Turner did not exhaust his state remedies regarding his claim of prosecutorial vindictiveness. Third, the State argues that Turner's Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel was never violated. Finally, the State maintains that a presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness should not attach to subsequent plea offers. We consider each of these arguments in turn.

II.

Under 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(3), a district court has power to grant habeas corpus relief to a prisoner who is "in custody in violation of the Constitution . . . of the United States." The State contends that the district court did not have jurisdiction to entertain Turner's request for habeas corpus relief because Turner was not "in custody in violation of the Constitution." We find no merit to this position. First, it is clear that Turner is "in custody" for the purpose of federal habeas corpus jurisdiction. As we held in Delk v. Atkinson, 665 F.2d 90, 93 (6th Cir. 1981), "[o]ne who has been released on bail while awaiting trial is in 'custody' for the purposes of § 2241." Furthermore, Turner clearly claimed to be in custody "in violation of the Constitution." Again as we said in Delk v. Atkinson, "28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(3) . . . does permit the issuance of the writ at the instance of one who claims he is in custody in violation of the Constitution of the United States, regardless of whether a judgment has been rendered." Id. In his petition for habeas corpus relief, Turner alleged that his impending retrial would violate his Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel and his Fourteenth Amendment right to due process of law free of vindictive prosecution. Therefore, the district court properly exercised jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(3) over Turner's claim that he was in custody in violation of the Constitution. Accord United States ex rel. Caruso v. Zelinsky, 689 F.2d 435, 437 (3d Cir. 1982) (a Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel at the plea bargaining stage is a claim cognizable under federal habeas corpus statutes).

III.

As the Supreme Court stated, "[w]here a state defendant is released on bail or on his own recognizance pending trial or pending appeal, he must still contend with the requirements of the exhaustion doctrine if he seeks habeas corpus relief in the federal courts." Hensley v. Municipal Court, 411 U.S. 345, 353 (1973). We are convinced that Turner has exhausted his state remedies.

Although the State does not argue otherwise, we note that Turner has exhausted his state remedies with respect to his claim that the scheduled state retrial would violate his right to the effective assisatnce of counsel: Turner "has taken his claim that he should not be tried again as far as he can in the state courts." Justices of Boston Municipal Court v. Lydon, 466 U.S. 294, 302 (1984).

The State does, however, argue that Turner failed to exhaust his state remedies with regard to his claim of prosecutorial vindictiveness. On February 12, 1987, the state trial court held a brief hearing during which Turner again rejected the State's twenty-year plea offer and the court set a trial date. The entire transcript of this hearing is ten pages, double-spaced. The State now contends that this transcript, which was presented to the district court but was never passed upon by the state appellate courts, contained "new evidence" that placed Turner's claim for relief "in a significantly different and stronger evidentiary position than it was in the state courts."

It is well-settled that a federal habeas corpus petitioner must present the state courts with the same factual and legal claims that he urges upon the federal court. Anderson v. Harless, 459 U.S. 4, 6 (1982). In Sampson v. Love, 782 F.2d 53 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 107 S.Ct. 159 (1986), for example, this court held that a habeas corpus petitioner, who had presented to the district court newly-discovered evidence of vindictiveness not considered at the state level, had not exhausted his state remedies because the new evidence placed the petitioner's claim "in a significantly different posture than that at the state level." Id. at 57. Turner's situation, however, is easily distinguished. The transcript of the February 12, 1987 hearing, which contained no new "evidence," clearly did not place Turner's claim in a "significantly different posture." Consequently, the State's argument that submission of the transcript to the district court required another review of the case by the state courts is without merit.

Having concluded that the federal habeas corpus statutes grant jurisdiction over Turner's petition and that Turner has exhausted his state remedies, we consider whether principles of federalism indicate that the district court should not have entertained Turner's petition for habeas corpus relief. Ordinarily, federal courts should not enjoin pending state criminal proceedings. Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971). Where, however, "special circumstances" justify federal intervention, a district court can exercise pre-trial habeas corpus jurisdiction over state criminal proceedings. Braden v. 30th Judicial Circuit Court of Kentucky, 410 U.S. 484, 489 (1973). This circuit has already established that a district court may entertain a petition for habeas corpus relief prior to a retrial in state court where the petitioner alleges that the retrial would be constitutionally offensive. Delk v. Atkinson, 665 F.2d 90 (6th Cir. 1981). Consequently, we conclude that the district court properly entertained Turner's petition for habeas corpus relief.

IV.

The State also contends that, contrary to the finding of every state and federal court that has examined this case, Turner's Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel was not violated. Although, as the district court observed, "[n]either the Supreme Court nor the Sixth Circuit ever has squarely held that incompetence of counsel that results in a defendant deciding to go to trial rather than plead guilty infringes the right to effective assistance of counsel guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment," 664 F. Supp. at 1118, the State does not challenge the proposition that incompetent advice to reject a plea offer can constitute a Sixth Amendment deprivation. The district court, after a thoughtful analysis, concluded that "an incompetently counseled decision to go to trial appears to fall within the range of protection appropriately provided by the Sixth Amendment." Id at 1120. We agree with the district court's analysis and conclusion. Accord Johnson v. Duckworth, 793 F.2d 898, 900-902 (7th Cir.) (criminal defendant has right to effective assistance of counsel in deciding whether to accept or reject proposed plea agreement), cert. denied, 107 S. Ct. 416 (1986); United States ex rel. Caruso v. Zelinsky, 689 F.2d 435, 438 (3d Cir. 1982) ("the decision to reject a plea bargain offer and plead not guilty is also a vitally important decision and a critical stage at which the right to effective assistance of counsel attaches"); Beckham v. Wainwright, 639 F.2d 262, 267 (5th Cir. 1981) (incompetent advice to withdraw a negotiated guilty plea and instead stand trial violates defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel).

While agreeing that the right to the effective assistance of counsel extends to the decision to reject a plea offer, the State challenges the conclusion that this right was violated. Under Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984), a Sixth Amendment claim of ineffective assistance of counsel is not constitutionally cognizable unless it can be shown that the attorney's conduct was both incompetent and prejudicial. Although it does not contend that Turner's counsel was not incompetent, the State argues that no Sixth Amendment violation was demonstrated because Turner failed to establish that he suffered prejudice as the result of his counsel's misconduct. To establish the requisite prejudice, the "defendant must show that there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different." Id. at 694.[1] "A reasonable probability

[1]In Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52, 58-59 (1985), the Supreme Court confirmed that the prejudice requirement of Strickland v. Washington applies to challenges to guilty pleas based on ineffective assistance of counsel. "In other words, in order to satisfy the 'prejudice' requirement, the defendant must show that there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's errors, he would not have pleaded guilty and would have insisted on going to trial." Id. at 59.

is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the out come." Id.

In arguing that Turner failed to demonstrate a reasonable probability that, but for his counsel's error, the result of the proceeding would have been different, the State identifies two alleged deficiencies in Turner's proof. First, the State claims that Turner did not demonstrate that he actually would have accepted the two-year plea offer had his counsel so advised. Second, the State claims that Turner failed to establish that the trial court would have approved the plea arrangement had Turner agreed to it.

The State is correct in maintaining that Turner must establish that there is a reasonable probability that, but for the incompetence of counsel, he would have accepted the two-year offer and pled guilty. The State, however, is incorrect in maintaining that Turner has not satisfied this burden. In considering this issue, the district court wrote:

> Turner testified that if Bailey had ever advised him to accept the offer, he "would have taken it, because I relied on his judgment." Transcript at 112-13. This testimony, by itself, is subjective, self-serving, and in the Court's view insufficient to satisfy the Strickland requirement for prejudice. There is objective evidence in the record, however, that tends to corroborate Turner's claim and provides independent reason to believe that there is a significant probability that, had Bailey's advice been reasonable, Turner would have accepted the offer.
> Turner's response to the two-year offer was to propose a one-year counteroffer. This fact itself rebuts the State's argument that Turner's publicly and pri> vately professed belief in his innocence would have prevented a plea. Moreover, as Binkley testified, the mandatory parole date for a one-year sentence was nine months, and the mandatory parole date for a two-year sentence was thirteen and a half months—leaving only a four-and-a-half month difference in time actually to be served under the offer and the counteroffer. Only a small difference remained between offer and counteroffer, and therefore only a small change in Bailey's advice might have closed the gap. Finally, Judge Kurtz concluded on the basis of the proof at the hearing and of "the Court's own observations during the course of this litigation," that "Turner at all times appeared to be under Bailey's control." Turner I Memorandum at 3. This factual finding based upon demeanor is entitled to considerable deference under 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d). Patton v. Yount, [457 U.S. 1025 (1984)].

> On de novo review, this Court concludes that there is objective evidence in the record "sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome" so that petitioner has met his burden of establishing that there is a reasonabe probability that, but for Bailey's incompetence, he would have accepted the two-year offer and pled guilty. The requirements of Strickland, supra, and Hill, supra, are satisfied. Petitioner was denied the effective assistance of counsel guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment.

664 F. Supp. at 1121-1122. Based on the foregoing analysis we agree with the district court's conclusion that Turner established a reasonable probability that, absent his counsel's incompetence, he would have accepted the State's two-year plea offer.

Moreover, we are unpersuaded by the State's argument that Turner failed to prove prejudice because he did not establish that the state trial court would have approved the two-year plea arrangement. Although the State is correct in stating that a plea agreement must be approved by the trial court before it becomes dispositive, see Mabry v. Johnston, 467 U.S. 504, 507 (1984) and Tenn. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(3), we do not believe that Turner was required to demonstrate a reasonable probability that the trial court would have approved the two-year plea arrangement. See United States ex. rel. Caruso v. Zelinsky, 689 F.2d 435, 438 n.2 (3d Cir. 1982 (court finds that federal habeas corpus petitioner presented meritorious Sixth Amendment claim of ineffective assistance of counsel in decision to reject plea bargain offer even though petitioner did not rebut possibility that "the trial court might not have approved the alleged terms of the plea bargain"). We know of no case or statute that imposes such a requirement, and we think it unfair and unwise to require litigants to speculate as to how a particular judge would have acted under particular circumstances.[2]

We find it much more significant that the State can point to no evidence that indicates that the state trial court would not have approved the two-year plea arrange-

[2]We note, however, that the record does establish a reasonable probability that the trial court would have approved the plea arrangement. First, Tenn. R. Crim. P. 11 essentially requires a trial court to ensure that a criminal defendant enter a guilty plea in an informed and voluntary manner. Therefore, by establishing a reasonable probability that he would have accepted the plea arrangement had his counsel so advised. Turner in effect established a reasonable probability that his guilty plea would have satisfied the requirements for acceptance under Rule 11. Second, the trial court approved an almost identical two-year plea arrangement for Turner's co-defendant Carroll. Finally, the various rulings of the state trial court give a strong indication that it was prepared to approve the original two-year offer had Turner accepted it.

ment. We believe that, if the State wishes to suggest that the trial court would not have approved this plea arrangement, the State, and not Turner, bears the burden of persuasion. The prosecution may, therefore, argue that a prisoner, who has established a reasonable probability that, but for his counsel's ineffective assistance, he would have accepted a plea arrangement offered by the prosecution, was, nevertheless, not prejudiced because the trial court would not have approved the plea arrangement. To prevail on such an argument, however, the prosecution must offer clear and convincing evidence that the trial court would not have approved the plea arrangement. Here, Turner has established a reasonable probability that he would have accepted the State's two-year plea offer were it not for his counsel's ineffective assistance. The State, on the other hand, has offered no evidence that the state trial court was not prepared to approve the contemplated plea arrangement. Consequently, we hold that Turner has established prejudice under Strickland v. Washington.

V.

Remedies for the deprivation of the Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel "should be tailored to the injury suffered from the constitutional violation and should not unnecessarily infringe on competing interests." United States v. Morrison, 449 U.S. 361, 364 (1981). In fashioning a remedy for Turner, the district court properly recognized that a new trial cannot remedy the specific deprivation suffered. 664 F. Supp. at 1123-1124. Turner does not complain of inadequate representation during trial. Instead, Turner claims that his counsel's misconduct cost him the opportunity to consider the State's two-year plea offer with the constitutionally-guaranteed assistance of counsel. Consequently, "[o]ne more fair trial, or even a series of them, would not necessarily revive the lost chance." State v. Kraus, 397 N.W.2d 671, 674 (Iowa 1986). Accord United States ex rel. Caruso v. Zelinsky, 689 F.2d 435, 438 (3d Cir. 1982). Indeed, the only way to neutralize the constitutional deprivation suffered by Turner would seem to be to provide Turner with an opportunity to consider the State's two-year plea offer with the effective assistance of counsel.

The Supreme Court has indicated that specific performance of a plea agreement is a constitutionally permissible remedy. Mabry v. Johnston, 467 U.S. 504, 510 n.11 (1984); Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257, 263 (1971). Nevertheless, the district court declined to require the State to reinstate its two-year plea offer. Instead, the district court concluded that Turner had "no absolute right to the remedy of specific performance of the former plea offer" but that the state court [sic, could] withdrew the offer only upon showing that the "withdrawal is free of a reasonable apprehension of vindictiveness." 664 F. Supp. at 1125. The district court went on to state that "a satisfactory showing would rescind the two-year bargain and free the parties to negotiate as usual." Id. at 1124. The State now contends that a presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness should not attach to subsequent plea offers in excess of the original two-year offer.

The Supreme Court has clearly established that a criminal defendant who successfully pursues his constitutional right to direct or collateral relief from conviction may not be subjected to greater punishment for exercising that right. See, e.g., Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974). To protect against the chilling effects posed by such retaliation, a rebuttable presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness should be established where there is a "realistic likelihood" of prosecutorial retaliation. Id. at 27. In United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368 (1982), the Supreme Court established criteria for determining whether a "realistic likelihood" of prosecutorial retaliation exists. As the district court recognized, courts should focus on "the nature of the right asserted" and "the timing of the prosecutor's action." Id. at 382, 381.

The Supreme Court announced that the presumption was appropriate where the right asserted would require "duplicative expenditures of prosecutorial resources," Id. at 383, and would require the State "to do over what it thought it had already done correctly." Id., quoting Colten v. Kentucky, 407 U.S. 104, 117 (1953). The Court pronounced the presumption especially warranted where the prosecutor moreover had a "personal stake" or there was "institutional bias against the retrial of a decided question." United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. at 383. As for the timing of the prosecutor's action, the Supreme Court announced that "a change in the charging decision made after an initial trial is completed is much more likely to be improperly motivated than is a pre-trial decision." In light of these criteria, we agree with the district court that "the structural analysis of Goodwin requires a finding of a realistic likelihood of vindictiveness in this situation and demands application of a rebuttable presumption of vindictiveness to any plea offer made by the State in excess of its previous offer on the eve of the first trial." 664 F.Supp. at 1125.

We believe that the district court's remedy for Turner's Sixth Amendment deprivation comports with the requirements of United States v. Morrison. Granting Turner another trial would not adequately remedy Turner's constitutional deprivation. On the other hand, requiring specific performance of the original two-year plea arrangement might unnecessarily infringe on the competing interests of the State. By allowing the State to withdraw the two-year plea offer upon showing that such a withdrawal is not the product of prosecutorial vindictiveness, the district court has struck the balance prescribed by United States v. Morrison.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

RYAN, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part. While I agree that the writ of habeas corpus was properly issued in this case, and find no fault with the remedy the district court has fashioned to rectify the constitutional violation which has occurred, I cannot agree with the district court's determination that a presumption of vindictiveness should attach to the state's twenty-year plea bargain offer. There is not the slightest indication in this record that the state's offer to the defendant to recommend that the trial court accept a plea of guilty to one count of aggravated robbery with a maximum sentence of twenty years' confinement is vindictive action taken as a means to punish the defendant for successfully appealing his conviction and seventy-year [sic] sentence.

The unique facts of this case warrant the unique relief we have approved—a hearing at which the state is required to show cause why its former offer of a two-year maximum sentence should not be reinstated. But nothing in this court's opinion or the district court's suggests a valid reason for further burdening the state's position by imposing a judge-made presumption, albeit rebuttable, that the state's twenty-year plea offer is vindictive. The controlling Supreme Court authorities for determining whether a presumption of vindictiveness should be judicially imposed make clear that "the Due Process Clause is not offended by all possibilities of increased punishment . . . but only by those that pose a realistic likelihood of 'vindictiveness.'" United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 384 (1982); Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21, 27 (1974). There is no such realistic likelihood in this case. The state originally had a compelling reason for making the inordinately lenient offer to Turner of a two-year plea: the concern that the prosecution would fail because Mrs. Hudson, one of the kidnapping victims, was "apprehensive about testifying again at the Turner trial," since she had already been through the unpleasant experience of testifying against Turner's co-defendant, Passarella. Apparently Mrs. Hudson's family also shared her reluctance to face the ordeal of another trial. Through no fault of the state of Tennessee, that early lenient offer was rejected by the defendant and the state was required to proceed to trial, risking the possibility of losing the case entirely if Mrs. Hudson's "apprehensiveness" hardened into non-cooperation. As it turned out, it did not. She testified against Turner, and he was convicted of two counts of kidnapping and one count of murder in the first-degree.

The convictions and the seventy-year [sic] sentence that resulted have now been set aside. The defendant, save for the unconstitutional ineptness of his retained counsel, would ordinarily be entitled to no more than a trial with the prospects of acquittal and freedom on the one hand, or a conviction and confinement for any number of years up to life on the other. The state of Tennessee, as prosecutor, has done nothing improper to bring about that state of affairs. The compelling motivation it once had to "give away the store," in the form of a two-year plea agreement, no longer exists, however. Nevertheless, the state has offered to allow Turner to plead guilty to a single count of aggravated kidnapping rather than the two counts of aggravated kidnapping and one of murder in the first degree, and to recommend a sentence of not more than twenty years. Whether Tennessee should be permitted to rescind its previous two-year plea offer in favor of its present twenty-year offer is a matter to be resolved by the state trial judge. No reason has been shown, however, to justify imposing upon the proceedings a judicial determination that the offer the state presently has on the table reflects presumptively vindictive retaliation against the accused for proving that he was the victim of unconstitutional ineffectiveness of his retained counsel.

I would return the proceedings to the trial court for a hearing requiring the state of Tennessee to show cause why the original two-year plea offer should not be reinstated, but without the application of any presumption in the matter because it is evident from the record before us that the state's twenty-year plea does not "pose a realistic likelihood of vindictinveness." Goodwin, supra; Blackledge, supra.

The STATE OF TENNESSEE.

No. 3-87-0152.

United States District Court,
M.D. Tennessee,
Nashville Division.

June 12, 1987.

Habeas petition was filed, in which petitioner alleged that his pending retrial would deprive him of his Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel and his Fourteenth Amendment right to due process of law free of vindictive prosecution. The District Court, Wiseman, Chief Judge, held that: (1) petitioner was denied effective assistance of counsel by trial counsel's failing to advise petitioner to accept two-year plea bargain offer, and (2) petitioner was entitled to reinstatement of plea offer for acceptance by petitioner and by trial court subject to prosecutor's seeking to rescind by making showing that would overcome presumption of vindictiveness attending such rescission.

Ordered accordingly.

Edward M. Yarbrough, J. Russell Heldman, Hollins, Wagster & Yarbrough, Nashville, Tenn., for plaintiff.

Kymberly Lynn Anne Hattaway, Asst. Atty. Gen., Nashville, Tenn., for defendant.

MEMORANDUM

WISEMAN, Chief Judge.

Petitioner James Howard Turner, awaiting retrial in a state criminal court on charges of murder and kidnapping, seeks issuance of the writ of habeas corpus pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 2241(c)(3) and 2254(a). Petitioner asserts that his impending retrial will deprive him of his Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel and his Fourteenth Amendment right to due process of law free of vindictive prosecution. For the reasons and pursuant to the conditions stated below, the Court concludes that the writ should issue.

I. Factual Banckground[1]

Petitioner was convicted by a jury on February 9, 1983 of first degree (felony) murder and two counts of aggravated kidnapping. Before and during this trial, he was represented by local counsel, Thomas C. Binkley,[2] and by an attorney from Socorro, New Mexico, named Lance Bailey.

---

[1]The Court held no evidentiary hearing of its own in this case, but has reviewed the relevant materials in the record, including the 245-page transcript (hereinafter Transcript) of the evidentiary hearing held in 1983 by the state trial judge, Hon. Walter Kurtz of the Criminal Court of Davidson County, on the occasion of petitioner's post-conviction motion for new trial. The facts of this case also are set out in fuller detail in State v. Turner, 713 S.W.2d 327 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1986), perm. app. denied, id. (Tenn. 1986), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 107 S.Ct. 407, 93 L.Ed.2d 360 (1986).

The charges against Turner stemmed from an incident In 1980 in which several men kidnapped and murdered a man named Monty Hudson and kidnapped Hudson's wife, Elizabeth. According to testimony in the transcript and to other materials in the record, Hudson apparently sold bogus silver to at least one of Turner's codefendants, Earl Carroll, to whom Turner had loaned some $6,000 for the purchase. Carroll and a third codefendant, Sam John Passarella, were accused of abducting Hudson from the parking lot of a Nashville hotel. Hudson later was murdered.

Carroll received a plea-bargained sentence of two years for simple kidnapping in exchange for his testimony and other cooperation. Passarella was convicted by a jury of two counts of aggravated kidnapping in a trial separate from Turner's[3]; he was sentenced to 70 years' imprisonment.

[2]The actions of Mr. Binkley, a member of the Nashville bar, are not at issue here. Judge Kurtz, who made a specific finding that Binkley's testimony was the credible version of events that he believed, found that Bailey was petitioner Turner's "lead attorney" who "in almost all respects . . . controlled" both Turner and the litigation. Binkley's role was found to be "minor" and "insubstantial." State v. Turner, No. C-8536, Memorandum Opinion of October 26, 1983 at 3, 9 (hereinafter Turner I Memorandum).

[3]Hudson's body was discovered after Passarella's trial but before Turner's trial, apparently as the result of information provided by Carroll. Thus, although the murder evidence apparent-

Turner, who allegedly abducted Mrs. Hudson from the same hotel parking lot in a separate car and later released her unharmed, was charged with two counts of aggravated kidnapping and one count of felony murder. Passarella's trial, at which both Carroll and Mrs. Hudson testified, took place in 1982 after Turner requested severance.

Turner received several plea offers before his trial commenced. Before and after he was indicted, prosecutors made offers of two-to-ten years and four-to-ten years in an attempt to gain Turner's cooperation in the effort to find Hudson's body. These offers were rejected. In the week preceding trial, the prosecutors[4] offered Turner a plea bargain of a two-year unsuspended sentence in return for a plea of guilty to a felony—essentially the same offer that Carroll earlier had accepted. This offer[5] remained open until noon on February 4, 1983, three days before ly pointed to Passarella as the triggerman and to Turner only as an accomplice, Turner was charged with the murder of Hudson and Passarella was not. Turner I Memorandum at 2-3. Passarella apparently has not subsequently been charged with the Hudson murder.

[4]The same assistant district attorney general, John Zimmerman [sic, Zimmermann], was a party to the plea negotiations during the immediate pretrial period, tried the case, and is responsible for plea negotiations now. See infra note 32.

[5]The reason the final plea offer was so generous apparently was that Mrs. Hudson, who had testified at Passarella's trial, was apprehensive about testifying again at the Turner trial. This reluctance was shared by her family. Turner I Memorandum at 5. The State's principal motivation for the earlier offers apparently was its desire to find the body and to develop evidence against the codefendants. Transcript at 144-47. The body had been found before the final plea offer.

trial, a deadline for settlements imposed by order of the court; the offer was never withdrawn.

Turner had rejected the earlier plea offers requiring longer sentences. In the final week, Binkley discussed the two-year offer in a conference call with Bailey and the petitioner; he "recommended strongly" that Turner accept it. Turner, however, relying upon the advice of Bailey as to his prospects in trial, made a counteroffer to the prosecutors of one year, which was refused. Despite a repeated recommendation from Binkley that the continuing two-year offer be accepted, Turner continued to rely on the advice of Bailey[6] and let the deadline for settlement expire.

At trial, Turner was convicted on all three counts and sentenced to life imprisonment for murder plus 40 years on each kidnapping count, to be served concurrently. Turner I Memorandum at 3, 14.

[6]Although Bailey testified at one point that he counseled Turner to "listen to what Mr. Binkley said" about the two-year offer, Transcript at 175, in other testimony he acknowledged that he was "optimistic" about the outcome of the trial and did not recommend that Turner accept the offer, Transcript at 176, 189-91. There was corroborating contemporaneous testimony at the evidentiary hearing that Bailey had an inflated estimate of his own abilities, an unrealistic estimate of the probabilities of outcome at trial, and a casual attitude toward trial preparation. Indeed, Bailey used cocaine and consorted with prostitutes during the weekend that preceded trial.

Observing live testimony from the petitioner and both his former lawyers, Judge Kurtz chose to credit the testimony of Binkley and of Turner, and to discredit the testimony of Bailey when he formed his conclusions about Bailey's "control" of the case and about Turner's relative reliance upon the advice given by Bailey or Binkley. This Court gives Judge Kurtz's factual conclusions in this regard, based at least in part upon demeanor, the considerable deference required by 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d). See Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025, 1038 & n.14, 104 S.Ct. 2885, 2892 & n.14, 81 L.Ed.2d 847 (1984).

About six months after trial, Judge Kurtz, after holding the evidentiary hearing, granted Turner's motion for a new trial based on the grounds that he had received ineffective assistance of counsel in making the decision to reject the two-year plea offer and to go to trial. Turner I Memorandum. The Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed in an unpublished opinion, and the Tennessee Supreme Court denied permission to appeal, concurring "in result only." State v. Turner, No. 83-287-Ill, slip op. (Tenn. Crim. App. Aug. 7, 1984), perm. app. denied, (Tenn. Dec. 17, 1984) (hereinafter Turner I).

During the pendency of appeals of Turner I, petitioner was detained pursuant to order of Judge Kurtz; he apparently has served more than two years already.

Upon remand to the trial court, petitioner and the State engaged in further plea negotiations in which the State offered 20 years in return for a plea to aggravated kidnapping and petitioner counteroffered a plea to simple kidnapping, which carries a maximum sentence of 10 years. After plea negotiations terminated, petitioner filed in the trial court a motion to reinstate the plea offer of two years, or in the alternative to dismiss the indictment.

Reasoning that granting the motion was the "only . . . remedy which will neutralize the constitutional violation," Judge Kutrz ordered the State to reinstate the two-year offer within 15 days or face dismissal of the case (apparently with prejudice). He noted that the State had "offered no real explanation as to why the offer is now twenty" instead of two years, and observed that reinstatement of the offer represented "the opportunity lost by the ineffective assistance provided to the defendant." State v.

Turner, No. C-8536, Memorandum and Order of February 28, 1985 (hereinafter Turner II).

The State received permission to apply for extraordinary appeal of this order.[7] The Tennessee Court of Criminal Appeals reversed, relying (1) upon state authorities for the proposition that a court cannot "require the state to make a particular plea offer"; (2) upon Tenn. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(1) for the proposition that a trial judge "shall not participate" in plea negotiations;[8] (3) upon state authorities and upon Mabry v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 504, 104 S.Ct. 2543, 81 L.Ed.2d 437 (1984) for the proposition that any plea agreement is revocable and unenforceable until it is accepted by the court; and (4) upon United States v. Morrison, 449 U.S. 361, 101 S.Ct. 665, 66 L.Ed.2d 564 (1981) for the proposition that although remedies for constitutional deprivations "should be tailored to the injury suffered," they should not unnecessarily infringe on competing interests and only "rarely" result in dismissal of an indictment. Turner II, 713 S.W.2d at 329-30. The appeals court concluded that the appropriate remedy in the case was "remand for a new trial." Id. at 330. On further appeal, the Tennessee Supreme Court denied petitioner's application for permission to appeal, and the United States Supreme Court denied certiorari. See supra note 1 for full citations.

[7]Technically, the State appealed the trial judge's denial of its motion that he reconsider or clarify his previous order. The appellate court deemed this no procedural bar to review of the underlying reinstatement order, because the State's intentions throughout were clear. Turner II, 713 S.W.2d at 329.

[8]The state rule is identical in this respect to the language of Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(1).

Petitioner's new trial date before Judge Kurtz is June 15, 1987. He filed his habeas petition in this Court on February 25, 1987.

II. Preliminary Issues

Before proceeding to the merits of this petition, the Court must deal with three arguments, two procedural and one substantive, made by the State, any one of which would preclude consideration of the ultimate issue that Turner seeks to raise: that the Constitution requires reinstatement of the lost two-year plea offer. The three preliminary questions are: (1) Is petitioner "in custody" for purposes of the habeas corpus statutes? (2) Has he exhausted his state remedies? (3) On de novo review by this Court, was he denied effective assistance of counsel guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment? The Court will dispose of the two procedural issues in this part of the Memorandum and deal with the ineffectiveness question in part IIIA.

A. Custody

Petitioner is currently on bond awaiting retrial. While the statutory language requires that a petitioner for habeas corpus be "in custody," the Supreme Court generally has construed this language to include, besides actual incarceration, "other constraints on a man's liberty, restraints not shared by the public generally." Jones v. Cunningham, 371 U.S. 236, 240, 83 S.Ct. 373, 376, 9 L.Ed.2d 285 (1963). Persons on bond awaiting trial generally are considered "in custody" for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 2241. Delk v. Atkinson, 665 F.2d 90, 93 (6th Cir. 1981); see Jus- tices of Boston Municipal Court v. Lydon, 466 U.S. 294, 104 S.Ct. 1805, 80 L.Ed.2d 311 (1984); Hensley v. Municipal Court, 411 U.S. 345, 93 S.Ct. 1571, 36 L.Ed.2d 294 (1973).

Treating pretrial detainees subject only to bond as "in custody" works no violence to state-federal comity because these petitioners nonetheless are still subject to the doctrine of exhaustion of remedies. See Hensley, supra, at 353, 93 S.Ct. at 1576; Lydon, supra, 466 U.S. at 301-02, 104 S.Ct. at 1809-10. The respondent's argument that Turner is not "in custody" is without merit.[9]

B. Exhaustion of Remedies

The State further argues that, although Turner has satisfied the exhaustion requirement for his claim of entitlement under the Sixth Amendment to reinstatement of the plea offer, he has not exhausted state remedies on the issue of prosecutorial vindictiveness. The respondent thus does not challenge, but the Court treats on its own initiative,[10] the question of exhaustion of the issue of ineffectiveness of counsel. In order to decide fully what remedy is constitutionally mandated in this case, both issues must be exhausted.

[9]The party responsible for Turner's "custody" appears to be not the State of Tennessee, the named respondent, but rather Judge Kurtz or the Criminal Court of Davidson County. Technically, the case style of this petition ought to be amended to so reflect.

[10]Although the requirement for exhaustion is not jurisdictional, Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 684, 104 S.Ct. 2052, 2062, 80 L.Ed.2d 674 (1984), in the Sixth Circuit this requirement is not waivable and must be treated by the Court sua sponte. Harris v. Rees, 794 F.2d 1168 (6th Cir. 1986); Bowen v. State of Tennessee, 698 F.2d 241, 243 (6th Cir. 1983) (en banc).

The doctrine mandating exhaustion of remedies in state courts before they ordinarily will be considered by a federal court arises from considerations of federal-state comity and requires a petitioner to:

> provide the state courts with a "fair opportunity" to apply controlling legal principles to the facts bearing upon his constitutional claim. It is not enough that all the facts necessary to support the federal claims were before the state courts or that a somewhat similar state-law claim was made. In addition, the habeas petitioner must have "fairly presented" to the state courts the "substance" of his federal habeas corpus claim.

Anderson v. Harless, 459 U.S. 4, 6, 103 S.Ct. 276, 277, 74 L.Ed.2d 3 (1982).

In cases in which there has occurred some factual development between the time an issue has been before the state courts and that same issue reaches a federal court, the Sixth Circuit has looked to the purpose of the exhaustion requirement and held that a claim is not exhausted if "new facts or evidence, not presented to the state courts" place a petitioner's claim "in a significantly different posture." Sampson v. Love, 782 F.2d 53, 55 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 107 S.Ct. 159, 93 L.Ed.2d 98 (1986).

1. Sixth Amendment Claim

Judge Kurtz squarely held in his Turner I opinion that the petitioner had been "denied effective assistance of counsel in violation of the Sixth Amendment of the United States Constitution" as well as of Article One, Section Nine of the Tennessee Constitution. Turner I Memorandum at 12

Ineffective assistance of counsel in Tennessee has been assessed under a "range of competence" standard adopted by the Tennessee Supreme Court in Baxter v. Rose, 523 S.W.2d 930 (Tenn. 1975). This standard is for all practical purposes equivalent to the "incompetence" prong of the two-prong "incompetence and prejudice" test established for ineffectiveness by the United States Supreme Court in Strickland v. Washington, supra.

Strickland, which added a requirement of "prejudice" with a "probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome" and clarified that counsel's performance should be assessed by an "objective standards of reasonableness . . . under prevailing professional norms," was decided on May 14, 1984—after Judge Kurtz's decision in Turner I and before the Court of Criminal Appeals' affirmance. Strickland was cited, however, by petitioner's counsel in briefs submitted to both the Court of Criminal Appeals and the Tennessee Supreme Court and by the State in its application to appeal the intermediate appellate court decision to the Supreme Court. Nonetheless, neither state appellate court stated an explicitly federal ground for its affirmance of Judge Kurtz; it is possible, thus, that no state court in this case has assessed whether Turner suffered the "prejudice" required by Strickland v. Washington,[11] supra.

[11]Judge Kurtz, writing before Strickland was decided, concluded "[t]hat Turner was prejudiced is evident; he was sentenced to life plus two (2) forty year sentences, when he had an opportunity to plead (to the lower penalty)." Turner I Memorandum at 12. Judge Kurtz also found that the two-year offer was "extremely generous," that any competent defense attor-

Even if this is so, however, this Court concludes that the exhaustion doctrine does not bar consideration by a federal court of the Sixth Amendment claim. First, it is clear that the trial judge made his finding of ineffective assistance under the pre-Strickland federal standard. Second, the federal standard was called to the attention of the appellate courts by both parties on direct appeal.[12] Third, both the trial and appellate court in Turner II obviously assumed that there was a federal violation that needed to be remedied: despite their differing conclusions, each court cited the federal case law regarding remedies, e.g., United States v. Morrison, supra. Fourth, no interest of federal-state comity would be served by resubmission of this case to the state courts. Regardless of any future holding on the Strickland v. Washington "prejudice" issue, petitioner still would be deprived of the relief he seeks ney would have seriously considered it and recommended acceptance by his client, and that Bailey was "overly optimistic about the outcome of the case, . . . imparted this unrealistic feeling" to Turner, "greatly understated the risks involved in taking this case to trial," and gave an estimate of the probable outcome of trial which was either "purposefully wrong or negligently given." Id. at 5, 12.

The Court of Criminal Appeals in Turner I, giving no citation to federal law, affirmed all of these findings by the trial judge as fully supported by the evidence; the appellate court made no comment at all on Judge Kurtz's finding of prejudice. As noted supra, the Tennessee Supreme Court concurred in the result only when it denied the State's application for permission to appeal.

[12]The "fair opportunity" doctrine does not require that a state court must explicitly address an issue, if both parties have squarely addressed it. Smith v. Digmon, 434 U.S. 332, 98 S.Ct. 597, 54 L.Ed.2d 582 (1978).

(only perhaps on a different ground), and still would be required to return to this Court to obtain relief. Finally, any finding by a state court on the Strickland "prejudice" issue would be subject not to deference but instead to de novo review by this Court. Strickland, 466 U.S. at 698, 104 S.Ct. at 2070.

Thus, the entire ineffectiveness of counsel issue, including both the alleged deprivation and its appropriate remedy, is eligible for review in this Court.

2. Vindictive Prosecution Issue

Petitioner argued to the trial court in Turner II, as one of three grounds for granting his motion to reinstate plea, that:

> Any less drastic remedy other than the relief requested in this motion would violate defendants state and federal due process rights to be protected from a realistic likelihood of prosecutorial vindictiveness or an apprehension of the same. North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 89 S.Ct. 2072, 23 L.Ed.2d 656 (1969); Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21, 94 S.Ct. 2098, 40 L.Ed.2d 628 (1974); U.S. v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 102 S.Ct. 2485, 70 L.Ed.2d 74 (1982); and Thigpen v. Roberts, [468] U.S. [27], 104 S.Ct. 2916, 82 L.Ed.2d 23 (1984).

At the time this motion was made, the plea negotiations subsequent to the grant of a new trial were as stated in Part I supra; they have not changed. The vindictiveness issue was briefed by both sides at both state appellate levels in Turner II, although not dealt with explicitly by the Court of Criminal Appeals opinion.[13]

[13]See supra note 12.

If there were any issue in this case of actual vindictiveness, the Court might agree that it was unexhausted; but petitioner has disclaimed that argument. Insofar as the "realistic likelihood of vindictiveness" is a factor to be considered in prescribing a remedy for the previous constitutional deprivation suffered by petitioner, that issue is exhausted.

III. Ineffective Counsel to Reject a Plea Offer—And Its Remedy

A. Constitutional Deprivation

Before turning to the issue of remedy, the Court first must answer two questions: Can incompetent advice by counsel to reject a plea offer ever violate the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, and, if so, do the circumstances of this case constitute such a violation?

1. Rejecting a Plea Offer

Neither the Supreme Court nor the Sixth Circuit ever has squarely held that incompetence of counsel that results in a defendant deciding to go to trial rather than plead guilty infringes the right to effective assistance of counsel guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment.[14]

It is well settled that the converse set of events does result in constitutional deprivation. In McMann v.

[14]The Supreme Court recognized that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel applied to the states in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 83 S.Ct. 792, 9 L.Ed.2d 799 (1963); that the right to counsel includes the right to effective assistance of counsel in Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 62 S.Ct. 457, 86 L.Ed. 680 (1942); and that the right to effective assistance extends not only to appointed counsel but also includes retained counsel in Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 100 S.Ct. 1708, 64 L.Ed.2d 333 (1980); and that the right extends to "critical" stages of pretrial proceedings in Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52, 82 S.Ct. 157, 7 L.Ed.2d 114 (1961).

Richardson, 397 U.S. 759, 90 S.Ct. 1441, 25 L.Ed.2d 763 (1970), the Court held that a defendant could seek to challenge a prior guilty plea if the waiver of rights therein could not be considered voluntary and intelligent due to ineffective assistance of counsel. Accord, Tollett v. Henderson, 411 U.S. 258, 93 S.Ct. 1602, 36 L.Ed.2d 235 (1973). In Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52, 106 S.Ct. 366, 88 L.Ed.2d 203 (1985), the Court applied the Strickland criteria to guilty pleas and held that, to successfully challenge a plea, a defendant must establish a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unreasonable errors, he would not have pleaded guilty and would have gone to trial. Id. at 57, 106 S.Ct. at 370, 88 L.Ed.2d at 210.

This Court has considered the argument that the Sixth Amendment provides asymmetrical protection to a criminal defendant engaged in plea negotiations, protecting against prejudicial advice by an attorney to plead but not protecting against prejudicial advice not to plead. Such a scheme would find some underpinning in the view that the right-to-counsel guarantee of the Sixth Amendment exists only to protect other rights, either "simply to ensure that criminal defendants receive a fair trial," Strickland, 466 U.S. at 689, 104 S.Ct. at 2065, or to ensure that, when defendants plead guilty, their waivers of rights to a trial by jury, to confrontation, and against self-incrimination are knowing and voluntary. See Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238, 243, 89 S.Ct. 1709, 1712, 23 L.Ed.2d 274 (1969). In this asymmetrical view, a defendant electing not to plead and to go to trial waives no rights, indeed he does the very opposite by invoking his Sixth Amendment right to go to trial. What need then of counsel?

While this argument may have some intellectual appeal,[15] the Court concludes that it takes an unrealistic and (considering and rejecting this asymmetrical view of the application of the right to counsel to a defendant's decisionmaking in a case in which a plea offer made to defense attorney was rejected without client consultation), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 107 S.Ct. 416, 93 L.Ed.2d 367 (1986); Commonwealth v. Thomas, 465 Pa. 442, 350 A.2d 847 (Pa. 1976), in which the court said:

> It is particularly significant that counsel is not here accused of persuading appellant to waive any of his rights but rather suggested that he avail himself of all of the protection provided under our system of jurisprudence. It would be in only the most unusual cases where such advice could be deemed a basis for an ineffective assistance of counsel claim.

350 A.2d at 850 n.3. Other state and federal courts considering cases in which a generous plea offer either was not communicated to a client and was rejected by the defense attorney, or was communicated to the client accompanied by ineffective advice, have treated the lawyer's functions as indivisible and assumed without lengthy analysis that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel protects both decisions to accept, as well as to reject, plea offers. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Caruso v. Zelinsky, 689 F.2d 435 (3d Cir. 1982); Beckham v. Wainwright, 639 F.2d 262 (5th Cir. 1981); Williams v. Arn, 654 F. Supp. 226 (N.D. Ohio 1986); State v. Kraus, 397 N.W.2d 671 (Iowa 1986) (plea bargain stage is a "critical point" in a criminal proceeding); Tucker v. Holland, — W. Va. —, 327 S.E.2d 388 (1985); State v. Ludwig, 124 Wis.2d 600, 369 N.W.2d 722 (Wis. 1985); Young v. State, 470 N.E.2d 70 (Ind. 1984); Rasmussen v. Arkansas, 280 Ark. 472, 658 S.W.2d 867 (1983); People v. Whitfield, 40 Ill.2d 308, 239 N.E.2d 850 (1969) ("It follows logically that if a defendant has the right to make a decision to plead not guilty, he also has the right to make the decision to plead guilty."); Hanzelka v. Texas, 682 S.W.2d 385 (Tex. Ct. App. 1984); State v. Simmons, 65 N.C. App. 294, 309 S.E.2d 493 (1983); Lyles v. State, 178 Ind. App. 398, 382 N.E.2d 991 (1978) ("a decision of the utmost importance: whether or not to plead guilty"); Commonwealth v. Napper, 254 Pa. Super. 54, 385 A.2d 521 (1978).

fragmented view of this most critical stage[16] in the criminal process. Between seventy and ninety percent of indicted defendants eventually plead guilty. W. LaFave & J. Israel, Criminal Procedure § 1.4 at 16 (1985). Virtually all are faced with the decision whether to plead or to go to trial—"probably the most important single decision in any criminal case." 1 Amsterdam, Segal & Miller, Trial Manual for the Defense of Criminal Cases at 2-143 (1967). See also Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 751, 103 S.Ct. 3308, 3312, 77 L.Ed.2d 987 (1983) (decision whether to plead guilty one of four "fundamental decisions" facing a defendant in the criminal process).

This narrow view of the right to counsel has at least two flaws. One is that Sixth Amendment protection of the ineffectively counseled decision to plead guilty, but non-protection of the ineffectively counseled decision to go to trial, would ignore the reality that these two decisions are alternative outcomes of the same attorney-client interaction:

> After informing himself or herself fully on the facts and the law, the lawyer should advise the accused with complete candor concerning all aspects of the case, including a candid estimate of the probable outcome. . . . If the accused's choice on the question of a guilty plea is to be an informed one, the accused must act with full awareness of the alternatives, including any that arise from proposals made by the prosecutor.

ABA Standards for Criminal Justice 4-5.1(a), 4-6.2 commentary (2d ed. 1980).

[16]Indeed, the Supreme Court has called plea-bargaining "an essential component of the administration of justice. Properly administered, it is to be encouraged." Santobello v. New York 404 U.S. 257, 260, 92 S.Ct. 495, 30 L.Ed.2d 427 (1971).

To accept or to reject a plea offer presents a binary choice at a fork in the road; providing constitutional protection against an incompetent shove in one direction, but not against an equally incompetent shove in the other, may produce unwanted skewing of the results. Like the character in the short story, criminal defendants facing this choice under asymmetrical constitutional protection may begin to see one alternative as the lady and the other as the tiger. Unforeseeable and undesirable effects on the overall functioning of the plea-negotiation process could ensue.

The second flaw in the asymmetrical approach is that it ignores the full implications of an ineffectively counseled decision to go to trial. A defendant in Turner's position has not merely rejected a plea offer; he has made a decision to go to trial "with a grave misconception as to the very nature of the proceeding and possible consequences." Beckham v. Wainwright, 639 F.2d 262, 267 (5th Cir. 1981).

The plea-rejection decision thus necessarily implies a corollary election to go to trial. If the adversary system of plea negotiation has worked well, defense counsel's advice on the "choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant," North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25, 31, 91 S.Ct. 160, 164, 27 L.Ed.2d 162 (1970), has reflected a balancing of the more certain outcome under a guilty plea, the degree of uncertainty of result at trial, and the worst possible penalties that could result from trial.[17] See Scott v. United States, 419 F.2d 264 (D.C. Cir. 1969).

[17]Courts have been uniform in holding that a defense attorney's total failure to notify his client of a prosecutorial plea

Thus, whether one views the purpose of the right to counsel narrowly as "simply to ensure . . . a fair trial," Strickland, 466 U.S. at 689, 104 S.Ct. at 2065, or more broadly as to protect "the fundamental fairness of the proceeding" and to guard against "unreliable" results due to "a breakdown in the adversarial process," id. at 696-97, 104 S.Ct. at 2069, an incompetently counseled decision to go to trial appears to fall within the range of protection appropriately provided by the Sixth Amendment.[18]

offer deprives a defendant of a decision rightfully his and thus constitutes Sixth Amendment ineffective assistance of counsel. See, e.g., United States ex rel Caruso v. Zelinsky, supra; Williams v. Arn, supra, at 236 (citing cases). While total failure to communicate an offer sounds more egregious in one sense than the mere conveyance of unreasonably bad advice, a defendant ignorant of a plea offer nonetheless may have a perfectly well-informed assessment of his chances at trial. In this sense, a defendant like Turner who rejects a plea on the basis of unreasonable advice about his prospects at trial may be more compromised than a defendant merely ignorant of a plea offer; he not only has lost an opportunity to make a bargain, he also is embarking upon a trial with a fundamentally distorted view of his prospects. Cf. Beckman v. Wainwright, supra, at 267.

[18]Alternatively, even if the Sixth Amendment right to counsel were held inapplicable to plea rejections, a right to counsel might still attach to rejection decisions by operation of the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause. The argument would be that concerns for individual autonomy and fundamental fairness demand the effective assistance of counsel for any defendant bartering his liberty against the arrayed prosecutorial power of the State. Cf. Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 93 S.Ct. 1756, 36 L.Ed.2d 656 (1973); Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 53 S.Ct. 55, 77 L.Ed. 158 (1932). The issue then would become whether the same, or a more attenuated, standard of effectiveness should be required of counsel's advice to reject under a due process analysis than under a Sixth Amendment analysis. See, however, the discussion in text supra re skewed incentives.

This Court concludes that ineffective advice to reject a plea offer does constitute a Sixth Amendment deprivation.

2. Actual Ineffectiveness

Was Bailey's conduct in this case both incompetent and prejudicial under the Strickland standard?

(a) Incompetence

In Strickland, supra, the Supreme Court counseled that judicial scrutiny of defense counsel's performance should be "highly deferential," avoid second-guessing, and begin with a "strong presumption" that counsel's conduct fell within "the wide range of reasonable professional assistance." 466 U.S. at 689, 104 S.Ct. at 2065. Deference is particularly due attorney decisions concerning strategy and tactics, id. at 689-90, 104 S.Ct. at 2065-66. Some circuit courts have concluded, thus, that this type of choice by counsel will be held ineffective only if it was "so patently unreasonable that no competent attorney would have chosen it" or it was so " 'ill-chosen' " as to render counsel's overall representation constitutionally defective." Adams v. Wainwright, 709 F.2d 1443, 1445 (11th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 1063, 104 S.Ct. 745, 79 L.Ed.2d 203 (1984); Adams v. Balkcom, 688 F.2d 734, 738

An ineffectively counseled decision to accept a plea may result in an unintelligent and involuntary waiver of rights but nonetheless provide a reliable determination of guilt or innocence. If the purpose of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel is only to provide "one of the crucial assurances that the result of the proceeding is reliable," Strickland, 466 U.S. at 694, 104 S. Ct. at 2068, perhaps the better view would be that the Sixth Amendment applies directly to neither decisional outcome of a plea offer. Both decisions to accept and decisions to reject, however, would be protected by a due process right to counsel.

(11th Cir. 1982) (quoting Washington v. Watkins, 655 F.2d 1346, 1355 (5th Cir. 1981)).

Weighed by even these highly deferential standards, Bailey's advice not to accept the two-year offer, or at the very least his failure to recommend acceptance, was well below an "objective standard of reasonableness." Strickland, supra, at 688, 104 S.Ct. at 2064.

Binkley "recommended strongly" acceptance of the offer at the time; he thought the decision to go to trial was "ludicrous." Transcript at 16-17. John Rodgers, who as assistant district attorney general was responsible for the earlier plea offers to Turner, testified that the final two-year offer "obviously . . . was a great offer and should have been accepted." Transcript at 157. James Neal, a well-known criminal defense attorney who represented Carroll in this case, told Binkley contemporaneously that Turner would "be crazy not to take" the two-year offer. Transcript at 7. On de novo review of this question, this Court agrees with Judge Kurtz's conclusion that Bailey's actions on the plea decision were outside the bounds of reasonableness established by professional norms.

(b) Prejudice

The test by which prejudice must be measured is the mirror image of the test established in Hill v. Lockhart, supra. Has the petitioner established by objective evidence that there is a reasonable probability that, but for the incompetence of counsel, he would have accepted the two-year offer and pleaded guilty?

Turner testified that if Bailey had ever advised him to accept the offer, he "would have taken it, because I relief [sic, relied] on his judgment." Transcript at 112-13. This testimony, by itself, is subjective, self-serving, and in the Court's view insufficient to satisfy the Strickland requirement for prejudice. There is objective evidence in the record, however, that tends to corroborate Turner's claim and provides independent reason to believe that there is a significant probability that, had Bailey's advice been reasonable, Turner would have accepted the offer.

Turner's response to the two-year offer was to propose a one-year counteroffer. This fact itself rebuts the State's argument that Turner's publicly and privately professed belief in his innocence would have prevented a plea. Moreover, as Binkley testified, the mandatory parole date for a one-year sentence was nine months, and the mandatory parole date for a two-year sentence was thirteen and a half months—leaving only a four-and-a-half month difference in time actually to be served under the offer and the counteroffer. Only a small difference remained between offer and counteroffer, and therefore only a small change in Bailey's advice might have closed the gap. Finally, Judge Kurtz concluded on the basis of the proof at the hearing and of "the Court's own observations during the course of this litigation," that "Turner at all times appeared to be under Bailey's control." Turner I Memorandum at 3. This factual finding based upon demeanor is entitled to considerable deference under 28 U.S.C. § 2254 (d). Patton v. Yount, supra.

On de novo review, this Court concludes that there is objective evidence in the record "sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome" so that petitioner has met his burden of establishing that there is a reasonable probability that, but for Bailey's incompetence, he would have accepted the two-year offer and pled guilty. The requirements of Strickland, supra, and Hill, supra, are satisfied. Petitioner was denied the effective assistance of counsel guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment.

B. The Remedy

In United States v. Morrison, supra, the Supreme Court observed that remedies for deprivation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel generally should be "tailored to the injury suffered from the constitutional violation and should not unnecessarily infringe on competing interests." 449 U.S. at 364, 101 S.Ct. at 668. The Court described its approach as "to identify and then neutralize the taint by tailoring relief appropriate in the circumstances to assure the defendant the effective assistance of counsel and a fair trial." Id. at 365, 101 S.Ct. at 668.

Counsel have characterized the remedial problem presented by this case as one of first impression, but the Court is not without analogous precedent upon which to draw. Indeed, the lost opportunity to accept a plea offer, in this case due to ineffective advice of counsel, can be generalized as one of several species of a group of cases that could be termed "disentitled pleas." These cases include a: (1) plea offer accepted by a defendant, accepted by the court, and then not adhered to by the government;[19] (2) plea offer accepted by a defendant, accepted by the court, and then withdrawn by a defendant acting upon ineffective assistance of counsel;[20] (3) plea offer accepted by a defendant, and then erroneously rejected by the court;[21] (4) plea offer accepted by a defendant, relied upon to his detriment by the defendant, then withdrawn by the government before accepted by the court;[22] (5) plea offer never communicated to a defendant, and rejected by his attorney;[23] and (6) plea offer, as here, rejected by a defendant acting upon ineffective assistance of counsel.[24]

Surveying this group of cases, several remedial principles emerge: First, the federal courts, for reasons of federal-state comity and of equitable discretion, if at all possible should leave the choice of the most appropriate remedy to the state court. Santobello, supra, 404 U.S. at 262-63, 92 S.Ct. at 498-99 (plurality) and 263-67 (Douglas, J., concurring). Second, in appropriate cases, some weight should be given to the defendant's choice of remedy. Id. at 267, 92 S.Ct. at 499-501 (Douglas, J., concurring) and 267-69, 92 S.Ct. at 501-02 (Marshall, Brennan, and Stewart, JJ., dissenting) (thus comprising a majority of the seven-Justice Santobello Court).

Third, the Constitution, while permitting specific performance as one within a range of permissible remedies, even in the most extreme case of prosecutorial misconduct may not necessarily require specific performance. Mabry v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 504, 510 & n.11, 104 S.Ct. 2543, 81

Delegal, supra* (abuse of discretion in rejecting plea); State v. Kraus, 397 N.W.2d 671 (Iowa 1986) (judge encouraged ineffectively counseled defendant to reject plea and go to trial). Finally, in the absence of either prosecutorial misconduct or judicial involvement, no reviewing court, either on direct appeal or collateral review, appears ever to have required the trial court to compel reinstatement of the disentitled plea offer.[25]

For remedial purposes, classes (5) and (6), supra, appear constitutionally indistinguishable. In each the defendant has gone to trial when there was a reasonable probability that, but for his attorney's conduct, he would have accepted an existing plea offer. In each there has been no prosecutorial or judicial misconduct. In each there has been no indication whether, had the unfulfilled plea agree-

[25]In Beckham v. Wainwright, supra, in which the defense attorney incompetently advised his client to withdraw a court-accepted plea and face trial under the erroneous belief that his client, if convicted at trial, could not be given a greater sentence than in the plea agreement, the Eleventh Circut affirmed the relief ordered by the district court that:

> Petitioner be allowed to reinstate his original guilty plea and thereupon be resentenced by the Court or alternatively that he be granted a new trial within a reasonable period of time hereafter, failure of which the Writ of Habeas Corpus will be granted and the Petitioner released from custody.

639 F.2d at 267 n.3. Thus, it is unclear who was to select among the alternatives.

ment been tendered to the Court, it would have been accepted.[26]

Most courts in these two classes of cases simply have vacated the conviction resultant from the first trial and have ordered a new trial.[27] As some courts have noted, however, the availability of a new (second) trial alone is hardly an appropriate remedy at all. First, those defendants who went to trial simply without knowing of an offer their attorney failed to communicate presumably were convicted in trials that were thoroughly fair. Second, even those defendants who, as here, may have embarked on their first trials with mistaken notions of their prospects,[28] seek relief from their convictions upon the basis of the incom-

[26]The State has argued vigorously that Mabry v. Johnson, supra, in which the Supreme Court denied relief to a defendant who accepted a plea offer upon competent advice of counsel, and then lost it when the government reneged before the offer was presented to the court, establishes a principle that unaccepted plea agreements are without constitutional significance and, therefore, that Mabry controls the outcome of the present case. In Mabry, there was no detrimental reliance by the defendant, who had competent counsel, and no other deprivation of her Sixth Amendment rights. 467 U.S. at 510 n.10, 104 S.Ct. at 2548 n.10. The Court held that the defendant had not been deprived "of liberty or any other constitutionally protected interest." Id. at 507.

In this case, this Court already has found that petitioner was deprived of his right to counsel as guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment or, in the alternative, by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See supra, note 15. Mabry, thus, cannot control this case.

[27]See, e.g., State v. Whitfield, supra, 239 N.E.2d at 852; Hanzelka v. State, supra, 682 S.W.2d at 387; State v. Simmons, supra, 309 S.E.2d at 498. Cf. State v. Ludwig, supra, 369 N.W.2d at 728 (new trial; this apparently was relief sought by defendant).

[28]See supra, note 17.

petent representation that led to the trial, not upon any that may have occurred at trial. Neither the first nor a second fair trial remedies the specific deprivation they have suffered. "One more fair trial, or even a series of them, would not necessarily revive the lost chance." State v. Kraus, supra, 397 N.W.2d at 674; see United States ex rel Caruso v. Zelinsky, 689 F.2d at 438.

Because the remedy of a "new trial" is not tailored to the constitutional injury suffered, those courts that have ordered only that remedy appear at first to have stopped short of adequate relief. Upon further reflection, it may be that the "new trial" ordered by these courts was a form of shorthand for "new trial with the opportunity to resume plea-bargaining." Indeed, several other courts in classes (5) and (6) have made this elaboration explicit. See Napper, supra, Lyles, supra; Tucker, supra; cf. Beckham, supra.

If resumption of plea bargaining were all that is required to purge the constitutional taint, this Court could stop here and deny the writ. Resumption unquestionably has occurred here, and has stalled in the fashion described supra. The issue presented, however, becomes: Is resumption alone enough?

The court in Napper ordered resumption of bargaining without further directions.[29] 385 A.2d at 524. The court in Lyles ordered a guilty plea hearing "assuming . . .

[29]The Napper court added without explanation: "We cannot compel the Commonwealth to reinstate its plea bargain offer; nor can we dictate what sentence may be imposed if appellant pleads guilty without so advantageous an offer as he had before, or if he goes to trial and is again convicted." 385 A.2d at 524.

the State's offer continues." 382 N.E.2d at 994. The Tucker court ordered tender of the former offer for consideration by the court, leaving open the possibility the court might reject it. 327 S.E.2d at 396.

What happened at the trial level in these cases upon remand is not revealed by the published decisions. Presumably offers were made and accepted. Perhaps if the prosecutor withdrew the offer or the court rejected it, the defendant might later have claimed that the action was barred by the due process safeguard against vindictiveness.

In this Court, however, that issue has been exhausted for determination. The parties and the state courts appear to have viewed the question as: Should the State's subsequent offer of 20 years be subject to a presumption of vindictiveness under the teachings of North Carolina v. Pearce, Blackledge v. Perry, United States v. Goodwin, and Thigpen v. Roberts, supra?

This Court frames the issue a little differently, viewing the State's actual offer as not before it.[30] What is before the Court, rather, is the question: Is any subsequent plea offer to Turner, higher than that extended before his first trial, subject to the due process presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness? Because the answer to this question must be in the affirmative, the Court concludes that the appropriate remedy for this petitioner must be a plea hearing at which the petitioner, if he chooses, would, as in Tucker v. Holland, supra, present the former offer as a completed agreement for consideration by the trial court under the usual procedures of Tenn. R. Crim. P. 11.[31] At this hearing, the prosecutor, if he chooses, could seek to show to the Court that there are objectively demonstrable reasons why the State should not be bound by the old offer and, therefore, should be allowed to rescind the "agreement" presumptively created for consideration by the Court. The showing required perforce must be of a manner and type sufficient to rebut the Pearce-Blackledge-Goodwin presumption of vindictiveness. If made, a satisfactory showing would rescind the two-year bargain and free the parties to negotiate as usual.

In United States v. Goodwin, supra, the Supreme Court laid out a structure for determining the circumstances in which a "realistic likelihood" of official retaliatory behavior against a person who has exercised a constitutional right is sufficiently high to warrant adoption of an "inflexible," though rebuttable "presumption of vindictiveness." 457 U.S. at 381, 384, 102 S.Ct. at 2429, 2494. Central to the Court's reasoning was an analysis of (1) the "nature of the right asserted" and (2) the timing of the prosecutor's action. Id. at 381-83, 102 S.Ct. at 2492-93.

The Court held that the erection of the presumption was particularly warranted in situations in which, first, the action taken by the defendant resulted in "duplicative expenditures of prosecutorial resources" and the State is required "to do over what it thought it had already done correctly," particularly if the prosecutor has a "personal [31]This Court sees no conflict between the remedy it prescribes and the relevant Tennessee rules. To the extent such a conflict might exist, state law would be required by the Supremacy Clause to yield to the Constitution. U.S. Const. art. 6, cl. 2.

stake"[32] or if there is "institutional pressure that . . . might . . . subconsciously motivate a vindictive prosecutorial . . . response to a defendant's exercise of his right to obtain a retrial of a decided question." Id. at 377, 383, 102 S.Ct. at 2491, 2494. Second, at least in charging situations, the presumption is less warranted before trial but more warranted after a defendant has been through a trial, when the State has had the opportunity to fully discover and assess all of the information against a defendant, and thus "a change in the charging decision made after an initial trial is completed is much more likely to be improperly motivated." Id. at 381, 102 S.Ct. at 2493.

Like the defendants held entitled to the presumption in Pearce, Perry, and Thigpen, supra, Turner has been through a trial, successfully asserted his constitutional right to a subsequent proceeding, and now returns to the trial court seeking a Constitutional remedy "tailored to the injury." Morrison, supra. The Court holds that the structural analysis of Goodwin requires a finding of a realistic likelihood of vindictiveness in this situation and demands application of a rebuttable presumption of vindictiveness to any plea offer made by the State in excess of its previous offer on the eve of the first trial.[33]

[32]Because the same prosecutorial office and the same prosecutor, Mr. John Zimmerman [sic, Zimmermann], has been responsible for the conduct of the Turner case before, during and after the first trial, no issue is raised in this case of the effect on the Goodwin presumption if different prosecutors were involved at the two plea-offer stages. Cf. Thigpen v. Roberts, 468 U.S. 27, 104 S.Ct. 2916, 82 L.Ed.2d 23 (1984) (leaving unresolved whether presumption applies to "two independent prosecutors").

[33]The Court recognizes that application of the presumption to a plea offer is not a settled proposition, but it perceives no theoretical bar. Judges prescribe sentences within statutory limits; prosecutors seek indictments or file informations constrained by probably cause; plea offers find their range within similar limits of statutorily prescribed penalties and potential acceptability to the court. In the admittedly unusual circumstances presented by this case, application of the presumption presents no great threat to the normal and desirable exercise of prosecutorial discretion endorsed by the Supreme Court in Goodwin and in Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 98 S.Ct. 663, 54 L.Ed.2d 604 (1978).

The Court holds, thus, that while petitioner has no absolute[34] right to the remedy of specific performance of the former plea offer, any action of the prosecutor to withdraw that offer is subject to the due process restraint against vindictive prosecutorial action. The former plea offer in this case remained open until the court-imposed deadline immediately prior to trial; the State did not withdraw it and petitioner did not competently reject it. Now that the petitioner's constitutional infirmity has been cured and he has been provided competent counsel, the State is free to withdraw the offer, so long as that withdrawal is free of a reasonable apprehension of vindictiveness.

Bordenkircher's holding that no presumption of vindictiveness should apply to escalation of charges that occurs in the give-and-take of pretrial bargaining does not prevent application of the presumption in the present circumstances, in which the plea offer at issue comes after a full trial.

[34]The Court rejects petitioner's argument that, by analogy to Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387, 105 S.Ct. 830, 83 L.Ed.2d 821 (1985), due process compels the State to provide him a state-created benefit to which he lacks entitlement as a matter of constitutional right, but of which was deprived by an independent constitutional deprivation. A plea offer standing alone cannot be likened to a formal state procedure that creates a property interest: by definition it is an offer awaiting acceptance.

As the Supreme Court noted in Thigpen, supra, 468 U.S. at 32 n.6, 104 S.Ct. at 2920 n.36 and in Goodwin, supra, 457 U.S. at 376 n.8, 102 S.Ct. at 2490 n.8, the presumption of vindictiveness is rebuttable "by objective evidence justifying the prosecutor's action." Id. In the Sixth Circuit, this requires "objective, on-the-record explanations." United States v. Andrews, 633 F.2d 449, 456 (6th Cir. 1980) (en banc), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 927, 101 S.Ct. 1382, 67 L.Ed.2d 358 (1981).

As stated supra, this Court for reasons of federalism and of deference to the trial-level court, Santobello, supra, holds that the appropriate forum to make these determinations is the Criminal Court of Davidson County. Moreover, an attempt by this Court to anticipate what showing the State might attempt in rebuttal would be premature. Without prejudging any particular showing the State might make, however, it would seem that objective evidence supporting a nonvindictive increase in a plea offer should be based on new facts or evidence that are not direct fruits of the previous deprivation or trial, were unknown at the time of the previous offer, and were discovered by means either independent of information gained from the first trial or at least the product of inevitable discovery.[35]

The focus should be on evidence rebutting a reasonable apprehension of vindictiveness, not merely rebuttal of actual subjective vindictiveness. See Wasman v. United States, 468 U.S. 559, 104 S.Ct. 3217, 82 L.Ed.2d 424 (1984) (five-Justice concurrence).

IV. Conclusion

To sum up, the Court finds inter alia that Turner is in custody for purposes of the relevant statute; that he has exhausted state remedies on the issues of the appropriate remedy for deprivation of his right to counsel and the application of the presumption of vindictive prosecution to the subsequent plea bargaining; that he received ineffective assistance of counsel in contravention of the Sixth Amendment and/or the due process clause; that the remedy tailored to neutralize this deprivation includes presentation of the previous two-year plea offer for acceptance by the petitioner and by the trial court, that the prosecutor may seek to rescind this presumptively mandated bargain subject to a showing that would overcome a presumption of vindictiveness; and that the forum in which this determination should be made is the state trial court.

For the reasons stated above, an appropriate order shall issue, conditioning the issuance of the writ upon satisfaction of the conditions stated above.

ORDER

For the reasons stated in the accompanying Memorandum, the writ of habeas corpus shall issue within 30 days unless the trial court holds a plea hearing at which (1) petitioner has an opportunity, if he chooses, to present the former two-year offer as a presumptively completed plea agreement for consideration by the court; and (2) the prosecutor has the opportunity, if he chooses, to seek rescission of the putative agreement conditioned upon an objective showing sufficient to rebut the presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness under the Blackledge v. Perry line of precedents. Of course, the trial judge is otherwise free to accept or reject any plea agreement offered, including the two-year plea, in accordance with the criteria otherwise applicable under substantive and procedural law.

The petitioner's trial is stayed pending execution of the terms of this Order.

RESPONSE TO PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI

Respondent, JAMES HOWARD TURNER, respectfully contends that the Petition for Writ of Certiorari filed in this Court by the State of Tennessee should be denied. This case does not depart from established case law. Neither does it offend this Court's decision in Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 363, 98 S. Ct. 663, 54 L. Ed. 2d 604 (1968).

The issue raised by the State of Tennessee on the applicability of the presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness at the state trial court hearing ordered by the District Court at 664 F. Supp. at 1126 must be addressed within the peculiar and special factual circumstances which have guided the federal courts below. The basic predicate fact is that Mr. Turner was denied his constitutional right to counsel at plea bargaining when his original trial counsel advised him to reject a generous two (2) year plea offer to simple kidnapping and go to trial. At trial, he was convicted of murder and two (2) counts of aggravated kidnapping and sentenced to life plus two (2) forty (40) year sentences. These convictions were vacated by the state trial and appellate courts which held that Mr. Turner was denied effective assistance of counsel when he was advised to reject the original offer. This violation required a constitutional remedy on remand.

What distinguishes this case from all the cases cited by the State of Tennessee is that the presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness is necessary to insure that the previous constitutional violation is remedied. The appropriate remedy to cure the taint of Mr. Turner's loss during plea bargaining requires that Mr. Turner be permitted to present the original two

(2) year plea bargain to the state trial court for approval. A presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness must apply to the remedial hearing ordered by the federal courts to insure that any decision by the State's prosecutor to rescind the two (2) year plea bargain comports with due process. Otherwise, Mr. Turner would have suffered a constitutional violation without an adequate constitutional remedy. Therefore, when the factual background of this case is presented, the issue raised by the State does not take on the radical implications that the State suggests.

All state and federal courts have unanimously held that Mr. Turner was denied his constitutional right to counsel during the original plea bargaining phase of this case when his original trial counsel, Lance Bailey, incompetently advised him to reject the State prosecutor's two (2) year plea offer to simple kidnapping and to proceed to go to trial on original charges of one (1) count of murder and two (2) counts of aggravated kidnapping. The state trial and appellate courts found that "any competent attorney would have advised the defendant to accept" the original two (2) years offer and Mr. Turner was granted a new trial. 664 F. Supp. at 1117 n. 11.

When the case was remanded and put back on the state trial court's docket, the State's prosecutor was unwilling to re-offer the original two (2) years sentence but would only offer twenty (20) years in exchange for a plea of guilty to aggravated kidnapping. Because the state courts had found that constitutionally incompetent counsel had prevented him from freely accepting the original two (2) year offer before the first trial and because that original offer was never withdrawn by the State prior to trial, Mr. Turner moved the state trial court to order that the original two (2) year offer be reinstated so that a remedy for the right to counsel violation would be tailored to meet the constitutional injury suffered, citing U.S. v. Morrison, 449 U.S. 361, 101 S. Ct. 665, 66 L. Ed. 2d 564 (1981). 664 F. Supp. 1118. (Joint Appendix, pp. 42-43). Mr. Turner also argued in his motion for reinstatement that "[a]ny less drastic remedy other than the relief requested in this motion would violate defendant's state and federal due process rights to be protected from a realistic likelihood of prosecutorial vindictiveness or an apprehension of the same," citing Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21, 94 S. Ct. 2098, 40 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1974), and its progeny.

After an evidentiary hearing, the state trial court granted the motion and ordered the State of Tennessee to reinstate the two (2) year offer or face dismissal of the case. The state trial court found that reinstatement was the only remedy available to neutralize the taint of the right to counsel violation during the original plea bargaining phase of the case. In its February 28, 1985, order of reinstatement, the state trial court further found as a fact as follows: "The State has offered no real explanation as to why the offer is now twenty (20) years instead of two (2) years." 664 F. Supp. at 1115. (Joint Appendix, p. 46).

The state appellate court subsequently reversed the state trial court's order of reinstatement upon finding that the state trial court had no authority to compel the State's prosecutor to make a particular plea offer under any circumstance. 713 S.W.2d at 330. After remand, Mr. Turner filed a petition for writ of habeas corpus in the District Court. Presented with this peculiar factual setting, the District Court granted the petition and this decision was affirmed by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals.

The District Court correctly reasoned that the mere grant of a new trial without reinstatement of the original two (2) year plea offer was insufficient to purge the taint of the previous constitutional violation adjudged. 664 F. Supp. at 1123-1124. Therefore, the District Court found that the subseqent offer of twenty (20) years to a plea of guilty to aggravated kidnapping fell far short of making Mr. Turner constitutionally whole. Therefore, the District Court found under these peculiar circumstances that the original two (2) year plea bargain was "presumptively mandated" and that at a remedial hearing to be held before the state trial court, Mr. Turner could present the two (2) year plea bargain to the state trial judge for approval. 664 F. Supp. at 1124. Then Mr. Turner will have been provided a constitutional remedy "tailored to the injury" according to the U.S. v. Morrison mandate. 664 F. Supp. at 1125.

Having ordered the remedial plea hearing, the District Court outlined how the State's prosecutor could rescind the original two (2) year offer without offending the constitutionally mandated remedy of reinstatement. 664 F. Supp at 1124. It is at the remedial state court hearing that the State's prosecutor can choose to rescind the two (2) year agreement by showing through "objective evidence" that rescission is justified and not purely based on vindictive motives. 664 F. Supp. at 1125. Then the District Court wrote: "Now that the petitioner's constitutional infirmity has been cured and he has been provided competent counsel, the State is free to withdraw the offer, so long as that withdrawal is free of a reasonable apprehension of vindictiveness." Id. As the Sixth Circuit properly added, the balancing of interests prescribed by U.S. v. Morrison is accommodated "by allowing the State to withdraw the two-year plea offer upon showing that such a withdrawal is not the product of prosecutorial vindictiveness" at the remedial hearing. 6th Cir. Slip Opinion, p. A16.

It is precisely this goal of adequately remedying Mr. Turner's constitutional deprivation while not infringing on the discretionary interest of the State of Tennessee which sets this peculiar case apart from the facts presented in Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 363, 98 S. Ct. 663, 54 L. Ed. 2d 604 (1968) and U.S. v. Osif, 789 F.2d 1404 (9th Cir. 1988).

The presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness established in Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21, 94 S. Ct. 2098, 40 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1974), and having its roots in North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 89 S. Ct. 2072, 23 L. Ed. 2d 656 (1969), was addressed for the first time by this Court in a pretrial setting in the Bordenkircher v. Hayes case. The Bordenkircher Court held that due process did not prohibit a prosecutor from carrying out a threat, made during initial plea negotiations, to bring additional charges against a defendant who refused to plead guilty to an offense with which he was originally charged. Bordenkircher v. Hayes held that North Carolina v. Pearce and Blackledge v. Perry were distinguishable where the prosecutor's action did not amount to a "unilateral imposition of a penalty upon a defendant who had chosen to exercise a legal right to attack his original conviction," the circumstance which North Carolina v. Pearce and Blackledge v. Perry addressed. 434 U.S. at 362, 98 S. Ct. at 667, 54 L. Ed. 2d at 610.

This Court further found that there was no Blackledge v. Perry element of punishment in the "give-and-take" of plea negotiations "so long as the accused is free to accept or reject the prosecution's offer." 434 U.S. at 363, 98 S. Ct. at 668, 54 L. Ed. 2d at 611. The Court wrote: "We hold only that the course of conduct engaged in by the prosecutor in this case, which no more than openly presented the defendant with the unpleasant alternatives of foregoing trial or facing charges on which he was plainly subject to prosecution, did not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." 434 U.S. at 365, 98 S. Ct. at 669, 54 L. Ed. 2d at 612. (Emphasis added). The Court further distinguished that it was not reviewing a situation "where the prosecutor without notice brought an additional and more serious charge after plea negotiations relating only to the original indictment had ended with the defendant's insistence on pleading not guilty." 434 U.S. at 360, 98 S. Ct. at 666, 54 L. Ed. 2d at 609.

One basic fact then clearly distinguishes the Turner case from Bordenkircher v. Hayes: because Mr. Turner received constitutionally incompetent advice to reject the original two (2) year plea offer, Mr. Turner was never "free to accept or reject" the State prosecutor's original offer. When the State's prosecutor upped the offer to twenty (20) years after a new trial was granted because of the constitutional violation, the situation that this Court was careful to say was not being addressed in Bordenkircher v. Hayes arose in Mr. Turner's case. That is, the State's prosecutor had increased the sentence offer from two (2) to twenty (20) years and the plea bargain charge from simple to aggravated kidnapping "after plea negotiations relating only to the original indictment had ended with the defendant's insistence on pleading not guilty." 434 U.S. at 360, 98 S. Ct. at 666, 54 L. Ed. 2d at 609. Accordingly, the federal courts below did not depart from the teachings of Bordenkircher v. Hayes. See 664 F. Supp. at 1125 n. 33.

Neither did the federal courts render a decision in conflict with the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals' decision in U.S. v. Osif. U.S. v. Osif required nothing more than a straightforward application of this Court's analysis in Bordenkircher v. Hayes. In U.S. v. Osif, there was no violation of the right to counsel at plea bargaining which required a remedy of reinstatement of the original plea offer at the subsequent trial. There was no obligation from the State's prosecutor to re-offer the original bargain to insure that a constitutional remedy be provided Osif. All that reversal of the original conviction required was a new trial and the refusal of the prosecutor in U.S. v. Osif to re-offer a previously rejected plea offer was not necessary to remedy a constitutional violation as the federal courts have explained in the instant case.

The reason for the invocation of the presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness in the Turner case is best explained by the "structural analysis" that this Court used in U.S. v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 102 S. Ct. at 2485, 70 L. Ed. 2d 74 (1982). See 664 F. Supp. at 1125 and 6th Cir. Slip Opinion, pp. A15-A16. Both the District Court and the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals utilized these guidelines in requiring the State of Tennessee to produce "objective evidence" at the remedial state trial court hearing if the State's prosecutor chooses to seek rescission of the "presumptively mandated" two (2) year plea bargain.

The Goodwin Court emphasized that in a post-conviction context where the Blackledge v. Perry concern of "duplicative expenditures of prosecutorial resources" and the North Carolina v. Pearce concern of asking a party "to do over what it thought it had already done correctly" are present, the Court will "presume" an improper vindictive motive where "action detrimental to the defendant has been taken after the exercise of a legal right." 457 U.S. at 373, 383, 102 S. Ct. at 2489, 2494, 73 L. Ed. 2d at 80, 87. Moreover, if "the institutional bias inherent in the judicial system against the re-trial of issues that have already been decided" is present, "the same institutional pressure . . . might also subconsciously motivate a vindictive prosecutorial or judicial response to a defendant's exercise of his right to obtain a re-trial of decided question." 457 U.S. at 376-377, 383, 102 S. Ct. at 2490-2491, 2494, 73 L. Ed. 2d at 82-83, 87.

Finally, the Court held that the presumption is especially warranted after a defendant has been through a trial and the State has had the opportunity to fully discover and assess all of the information against him, concluding that "a change in the charging decision made after an initial trial is completed is much more likely to be improperly motivated than is a pretrial decision." 457 U.S. at 381-382, 102 S. Ct. at 2493, 73 L. Ed. 2d at 85.

As the District Court and the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals have pointed out, all the above Goodwin criteria were present at the time Mr. Turner's motion for reinstatement was made, thereby requiring a presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness to attach and compel the prosecutor to rebut the presumption if rescission of the plea bargain is sought. 664 F. Supp. at 1125. Unlike Bordenkircher v. Hayes, the Goodwin concerns of (1) duplicating "prosecutorial resources," (2) asking a prosecutor "to do over what it thought it had done correctly," and (3) "the institutional bias inherent in the system against the re-trial of issues that have already been decided" were all present when on remand from the grant of new trial, the State's prosecutor upped Mr. Turner's offer to twenty (20) years from two (2) years. The increase in the sentence offer came after the State had extended Mr. Turner two (2) years originally, after it was rejected on advice of incompetent counsel but never withdrawn by the State pretrial, after a trial had already occurred once, after Mr. Turner's convictions had been subsequently vacated and after the state appellate courts affirmed the original findings of a right to counsel violation at plea bargaining. With these peculiar facts presented to the District Court at this juncture, it correctly held "that the structural analysis of Goodwin requires a finding of a realistic likelihood of vindictiveness in this situation and demands application of a rebuttable presumption of vindictiveness to any plea offer made by the State in excess of its previous offer on the eve of the first trial." 664 F. Supp. at 1125.

This Court should further accord the state trial court's findings of fact the presumption of correctness due under 28 U.S.C. §2254(d) in denying the State's petition. See Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412, 425, 105 S. Ct. 844, 853, 88 L. Ed. 2d 841 (1985). The issue of prosecutorial vindictiveness was raised by Mr. Turner in his original motion to reinstate or dismiss of February 14, 1985. 664 F. Supp. at 1118. (Appendix, pp. 42-43). In the state trial court's order of reinstatement, it found as a fact after an evidentiary hearing as follows: "The State has offered no real explanation as to why the offer is now twenty (20) years instead of two (2) years." 664 F. Supp. at 1115. (Joint Appendix, p. 46). Having once failed to make any showing to rebut the charge of prosecutorial vindictiveness in response to the original motion, the federal courts have properly held that the State of Tennessee cannot rescind the two (2) year plea bargain unless at the remedial state court hearing it can show "objective evidence supporting a non-vindictive increase." 664 F. Supp. at 1126. See also Thigpen v. Roberts, 468 U.S. 27, 32 n. 6, 104 S. Ct. 2916, 2920 n. 6, 82 L. Ed. 2d 23, 30 n. 6 (1984), wherein the presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness was upheld by this Court: "The State had ample opportunity to rebut it but did not do so."

Mr. Turner further contends that without the presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness at the remedial state court hearing order below, the State of Tennessee would in effect never be required to honor the constitutionally mandated remedy due Mr. Turner. The opportunity to present the plea bargain for acceptance by the trial court through competent counsel can only occur after the original two (2) year offer is reinstated and only the State of Tennessee can reinstate it. See State ex rel. Caruso v. Zelinsky, 689 F.2d 435, 438 (3rd Cir. 1982). Reinstatement of the original offer "plac[es] the State and the accused in the same positions they would have been in had the impermissible conduct not taken place." Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431, 447, 104 S. Ct. 2501, 2511, 81 L. Ed. 2d 377, 389 (1984); U.S. v. Bowers, 517 F. Supp. 666, 672 (W.D. Pa. 1981).

Requiring the State to overcome a presumption of prosecutorial vindictiveness insures that the State of Tennessee does not take advantage of Mr. Turner who has suffered a serious constitutional loss. Otherwise, the State's prosecutor may without any constitutional accountability be allowed to rescind the offer. Mr. Turner submits that such action by the State's prosecutor would violate the State's "affirmative obligation not to act in a manner that circumvents and thereby dilutes the protection afforded by the right to counsel." See Maine v. Moulton, -- U.S. --, 106 S. Ct. 477, 485, 88 L. Ed. 2d 481, 493 (1985).

At the very least, the federal courts have remanded this case to a state trial court judge wherein he must first decide whether or not to approve the two (2) year plea agreement. Since the issue raised by the State of Tennessee depends upon the happening of this contingency, this case may not be ripe for this Court to exercise its powers of review at this juncture. Nevertheless, Mr. Turner submits that the decision of the District Court and the affirmance by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals is properly supported by precedent and does not offend the legitimate competing interests of the State of Tennessee.

The petition for writ of certiorari should therefore be respectfully denied.

Respectfully submitted,

HOLLINS, WAGSTER & YARBROUGH, P.C.
